Fucoidan: a review of its chemical and biological properties. Fucoïdan is a sulfated polysaccharide present in brown algae and is composed of L-fucose and sulfate (1-4). Fucoïdan contains high-molecular-weight sulfated polysaccharides, such as fucoglucan, fucoidan, fucosyl glucuronate, and sulfated arabinogalactan with biological activities. These include anti-thrombotic, anti-cancer, antioxidant, anti-viral, anti-inflammatory, and immunomodulatory properties. Fucoïdan is readily extracted from seaweed and therefore has become attractive as an important source of polysaccharides. Apart from its use as a dietary supplement, fucoidan is used as the main ingredient in some cosmetic products. In this review, we summarize the occurrence, isolation, purification, structure, biological activities, clinical trials, and toxicological issues of fucoidan.
